SHORT ANSWER

79. Karl Marx describes capitalist systems as “exploitive.” Briefly describe the main feature of capitalism that Marx uses to explain this—who exploits whom, and how?

ANS:

In Marx’s explanation, capitalists exploit proletariat. The capitalists are the owners of the means of production and they exploit the proletariat, who are the workers. The proletariat doesn’t own anything except their own labor, which they sell to the capitalists. Basically, the workers make everything, but the capitalists reap all the rewards, a/k/a make all the profits, even though they barely do anything.

80. According to Karl Marx, workers experience “alienation” in the workplace. What does it mean to say they are “alienated”? Name two of the three ways they are alienated, based on your reading of Ritzer’s text.

ANS:

“Alienation” means that workers are disconnected from the human qualities of their own labor. Workers are alienated because (1) the work is repetitive and that is not a natural expression of human creativity and capabilities; (2) they have little connection to the finished product that results from their work; and (3) they feel little connection to their fellow workers.

81. Consider the current state of the United States in light of Karl Marx’s theories. What is one way that Marx’s predictions hold when looking at current behaviors in the U.S. economic system? What is one way that they failed to predict what would happen?

ANS:

Varies, but examples for each could include: Marx was right about the growing income gap between the top of the economic system, the “capitalists” and everyone else, the “proletariat.” Marx was also right about the need for capitalists to find the cheapest sources of labor and resources around the world. However, Marx was wrong about the proletarian revolution, which hasn’t happened and seems very unlikely to happen, and he was wrong about the evolution of systems from capitalism to communism. Capitalism continues to exist and shows no sign of ending anytime soon.

82. According to Ritzer’s description of Marx, Durkheim, and Weber, what level of society did all three major early social theorists focus on in their works? Of the three, which were critical and which were positive in their views?

ANS:

Marx, Weber, and Durkheim had in a common a focus on the macro structures of society. Marx and Weber were both critical of these macro structures. Marx criticized capitalism while Weber was critical of the rationalization of society in capitalist systems. Durkheim was not like Marx and Weber. He had a mostly positive view of macro structures, feeling that they were not only necessary but highly desirable. Marx and Weber worried about too much control over the individual by society, but Durkheim worried more about too little control or guidance to help the individual function well in society and control his or her passions.

83. One of Durkheim’s major concepts is that of “collective conscience.” What is meant by this term? What is an example of collective conscience? Did Durkheim see collective conscience as a good or a bad thing? Why?

ANS:

Varies, but the answer should address each part of this question. What is meant by collective conscience: “A set of beliefs shared by people throughout society.” What is an example? The shared belief that it is wrong to kill each other, or another similar, widely held and uncontroversial shared belief. Finally, Durkheim thought this was a good thing because society could not function without a set of shared beliefs.

ESSAY

84. An important part of Karl Marx’s theories on capitalism relate to consciousness—how people think about things. In this essay, please name and define the two main roles that people hold in a capitalist economy. How do these roles interact in the capitalist economy to produce false consciousness? Who holds what Marx calls “false consciousness”? How are they led to believe this? What did Marx propose to replace false consciousness, and how did he suggest it would affect society?

ANS:

The two main roles that people hold in capitalism are capitalists—the owners of the means of production, and proletariat—the workers. Marx suggests that false consciousness is produced in capitalism because capitalists receive most of the rewards, through profits, of the work of the proletariat. The proletariat have a false consciousness when they fail to understand how capitalism works, or they incorrectly believe that capitalism benefits them. Workers may believe this because they do not see their own exploitation. They are alienated from the products of their labor, so they do not see how their own work is claimed and earns a profit for someone else, or they don’t believe that this is wrong due to ideology produced by the capitalists, which supports the capitalist system as good. Marx proposed that class consciousness would develop among workers to replace false consciousness, in which workers would truly see the way the system works. This would lead to uprising and revolution. Capitalists would never gain class consciousness because it was not in their interest to see it another way—they benefit too much from the existing system.

85. Max Weber is a very important social theorist in sociology. One of his major works tied religious ethics to economic systems. Briefly describe the relationship he found that connected Protestants and Calvinist beliefs to a capitalist economy.

ANS:

In The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, Weber looked at societies around the world and analyzed the relationship between religion and economy. He found unique beliefs held by Calvinists and Protestants who believed whether a person went to heaven or hell was already set and unchangeable, but one might be able to detect whether they were destined for heaven or hell by success on earth, especially financial success. This created an unexpected incentive for succeeding financially. However, religious beliefs also required frugality, leading to accumulation. Weber showed the relationship between this set of religious ideas and success in a specific economic system.

86. Émile Durkheim described two types of solidarity. Briefly compare these two forms of solidarity, using concrete examples to illustrate how they differ. What type of society is each solidarity type associated with? How much power does collective conscience have in each type of solidarity, and why is a weaker collective conscience a problem?

ANS:

Varies but should include a description of mechanical solidarity and organic solidarity. Mechanical solidarity has a low division of labor while organic solidarity has a high division of labor. This means that people do many jobs and each person's job is similar to others in mechanical solidarity. In organic solidarity, this means people are specialized and have jobs that differ from one another. An example of mechanical solidarity might be that everyone in the group farms, cooks, and parents children. An example of organic solidarity would include that only some people specialize in farming while others do not at all, and some people can become chefs while others can simply purchase prepared food and never learn to farm or cook. Mechanical solidarity is associated with simpler and earlier societies, while organic solidarity is associated with modern and larger societies. Earlier, simpler societies with mechanical solidarity tend to have higher collective conscience, which weakens as they move to a larger, more diversified organic solidarity model of society. This is bad, according to Durkheim, because when the collective conscience weakens, people are more likely to feel anomie, or a sense of confusion about their place and what is expected of them in society, and this can lead to feelings of meaninglessness, despair, and raise suicide rates.

87. The black sociologist W.E.B. Du Bois was an early contributor to sociology on theories related to race and the effects of racial discrimination. He is well known for several important works and theories, including his theory of double consciousness. In this essay, please explain the concept of double consciousness. What are some of the consequences of people who possess double consciousness? How might this be applied to race relations today?

ANS:

Varies but should include an explanation of double consciousness: the sense of “two-ness” of related to belonging to two categories simultaneously that are not completely in agreement with one another, where one places the person within the dominant group and the other category places them outside of it. Being an American and being an African American in the case of black people in the United States is the primary example, but this could be applied to other groups or countries where one identity is considered a dominant category and the other is a minority category. A potential negative consequence of a double consciousness is a sense of tension for the individual between two thoughts or two ideas. However, a positive outcome is that this can produce unique insights about being in either the marginal or the dominant category, or about society in general.

89. Discuss the differences and similarities between the structural-functionalist theoretical perspective and the conflict perspective.

ANS:
Varies but should include that structural-functionalism focuses on social structures and their functions. Structural-functionalist theorists start out with a positive view of social structures and believe that current social structures exist because they are necessary and desirable. This gives them a conservative view—if it exists, it must need to exist to perform specific functions. Figures include classically Émile Durkheim and contemporary Robert Merton. Book example given describes national borders and passport controls from a structural-functionalist perspective as a necessary function. The theory later also included dysfunctions, where the consequences may be negative. Merton also added the concepts of manifest (conscious and purposeful) functions and latent (unintended positive) functions. Unintended consequences may also result that are either positive or negative. By contrast Conflict theory deriving from Marx, can be seen as “an inversion” of structural functionalism. It focuses more on the negative than the positive. Society is held together not by the necessity of functions and consensus or agreement with social structures but by power relations and coercion; specifically, the power of some to determine the rules for all. Dahrendorf is used as a contemporary example of a conflict theorist. Interests are worked out between groups, often in a way that favors one group or class over the other.

90. How does the exchange theory help us understand how people choose a college? Compare this to how rational choice theory would explain the same thing.

ANS:

Varies but should include for exchange theory the idea that people continue in courses of action when the rewards outweigh the costs, and discontinue when the costs are greater than the rewards. When searching for a college program, a person might make the choice based on the program with the lowest tuition, the best scholarship, or they might choose to live closest to home so that costs are lowered by living with family. Rational choice theory, on the other hand, would see the desire to graduate from college as a goal someone has, and that people act intentionally to achieve their goals. So looking for a college would be based on the means most likely to best satisfy their needs and wants, such as having the best program in one's field to allow them to reach their career goals. However, they have to believe they can get "access to scarce resources," in this case, be accepted into the program. They would also have to meet "the requirements of social structures," in this case, to be able to take on the role of full-time student.

91. Use what you know about critical theory to discuss Facebook and the culture industry. According to Ritzer, what is mass culture, and what is the culture industry? Would Facebook be considered a part of the culture industry? Having considered these arguments, do you agree or disagree that Facebook is a part of the "culture industry"?

ANS:

Varies but should include a definition of culture industry as the creator of mass culture—culture created by organizations or corporations intended for mass consumption that falsify reality, present themselves as authentic but are not authentically created art created by people, and that presents unchallenging messages that repress and mollify people rather than presenting challenging or upsetting messages that might result in social action or support for social change. Mass culture also ingrains certain brands as a part of creating a consumer culture that connects consumption to social class identities. Ritzer argues that Facebook does contain some mass culture, advertisements, and inauthentic content from companies and organizations, but it also contains content that is generated by people for people, and is arguably spontaneous and authentic. Aside from some basic obscenity rules, Facebook exercises little control over the content, so perhaps it is not a part of the culture industry. However, another argument is that even if the content is not culture industry, Facebook as a platform is a "culture industry" medium that makes billions of dollars for its owners. It also can be seen as repressing and pacifying people so they don't act for social change or spend their time on more meaningful forms of social activism. Finally, it may be a more subtle, personalized, and possibly effective way to target market to individuals toward consumption of specific brands. The respondent can use these points however they like to argue that Facebook is a stronger culture industry or a weakening of culture industry.
